Tolerance, Violence, and Media!

Tolerance is defined as the acceptance of differences as well as the ability to live and let others live. It is the ability to treat people fairly, regardless of their beliefs, behaviors, religion, nationality, or other factors. 1/n

Tolerance is more than merely agreeing with one another or staying neutral in the face of injustice; it is about demonstrating respect for each person's inherent humanity. 2/n

The failure to appreciate and accept the customs, ideas, and beliefs of another group is referred to as intolerance. For example, intolerances could arise over issues such as identity (caste, religion), self-determination, statehood, refugee return rights, and so on. 3/n

In today's world, prejudice begins with "those who have the remote control in their hands in the drawing-room." We used to have days when the entire colony sat around and watched a TV show, 4/n but nowadays, every room has a TV because there are so many channels to choose from and people like different ones. Siblings in the same room use computers to view their shows. 5/n

The use of force to damage (physically or emotionally) or abuse someone is known as violence. The term is used to denote a destructive activity, such as purposeful and forceful injury to individuals, property damage, and verbal and emotional abuse of others. 6/n

Individuals' opinions about one another are based on assumptions due to a lack of experience. 7/n

The positive or negative beliefs of those who have the most influence in their lives (parents, family members, colleagues, instructors, and/or role models) might have an impact on this. Individuals' intolerance is perpetuated as a result of this. 8/n

Individual opinions are shaped by media and press images of other groups. In education, there are biased and/or bad historical accounts of world cultures in the school curriculum and educational literature. 9/n

Instead of promoting cultural knowledge and tolerance for diversity and differences, myth-based education or schooling can denigrate and demean other cultures. 10/n

Tolerance is preferable to intolerance when it comes to tolerance. How can one be accepting of others who despise them? Tolerance of bigotry is not acceptable nor attainable for many people. Tolerance is still crucial to reducing hostile relations amongst people. 11/n

Tolerance aids the affected groups in enduring the agony of the past and resolving their differences in times of violent conflict. 12/n

Here are some suggestions:

Individuals: In their daily lives, individuals should strive to be more tolerant of others. This entails intentionally confronting preconceptions 13/n and assumptions that people come across when making judgments about others and/or dealing with others in a social or professional setting. 14/n

Press Media: The media should present positive images to foster cultural sensitivity and understanding. People are less inclined to find fault with one another if they are exposed to good media messages about different cultures. 15/n

Those populations, in particular, have little contact with the outside world and are sensitive to what the media tells them! 16/n

Ironically, the media prefers sensationalism and thus unintentionally fosters unfavorable stereotypes about many populations. STAY AWAY FROM SENSATIONALISM! 17/n

Educators play a critical role in promoting tolerance and peaceful cooperation. Schools that foster tolerance, for example, assist young people in respecting and understanding diverse cultures. 18/n

Stop glorifying violence and supporting terrorism in the movies. This is impossible since the entire media is funded by terrorists. The irony is that we have more people watching movies than reading blogs! 19/n

They are powerful, and if they use their power for good, they can change the world! 20
