Although there is currently no committee specifically dedicated to women's issues at Occupy Philadelphia, English Professor Ania Loomba believes that it must be women who harness the Occupy movement to promote their own interests. "Women have to be participants in very large numbers because I think it really does affect them," Loomba said. "We know that issues of poverty effect women disproportionately...at the bottom, there are more women than men."

Loomba has been involved in the Occupy movement since she drafted a solidarity statement signed by approximately 100 Penn faculty members and has been to the occupation at City Hall numerous times.

One issue that has been raised in regards to women's issues and Occupy Philly was the alleged rape at Occupy Philadelphia reported on November 12. After the incident, Mayor Nutter declared that Occupy Philly "has changed." Loomba, however, was quick to counter that.

"The thing is that, in the city of Philadelphia, there were 28 other rapes that day," Loomba said. "If you start saying a woman was raped at occupy, that might be used to scare women away ... for me, it's very heartening to see women in public space." She likened women occupying public space to feminist movements such as Take Back the Night.

UPenn senior Alex Nic, a member of OccupyPenn, wrote in an email that the Occupy movement has actually helped "develop safe spaces [and] value consent and sexual assault survivorship." He added, "The development of protective

On September 17, 2011, New York City's Zuccotti Park became the first site of the Occupy protests where protesters rejected existing political institutions and attempted to create alternative ones through direct action and direct democracy.

Nine years later, India's capital -- New Delhi -- is witnessing farmers from Punjab and Haryana sitting in at the Singhu and Tikri border points for the past five days, braving water cannons, tear gas and the biting cold.

Occupy Wall Street's eviction from Zuccotti Park gives new significance to the movement's planned "Day Of Action" Thursday. Celebrating the two month anniversary of the demonstrations, which have spread across the world, protesters plan to disrupt the New York Stock Exchange, 'occupy' the city's major transportation hubs, and hold a massive rally in Foley Square outside City Hall.
